Identifying Citation Information

APA

What is APA?
APA citation style is a way to show your professors what information you are using in your research papers. You need to record things like title of the work, author, and date of publication. Tip: try and keep track of all the articles, books and websites you use by emailing them to yourself.

What information do I need to cite a book from the library catalogue?
At its most basic, you need to look for author, title, publisher, place of publication and publication date. If it’s an electronic book make sure you know what database it came from.

What information do I need to cite an article from a library database?
You still need author, title, and publication date. An article citation also includes journal or magazine title AND the volume, issue and page number. You also need to list the database where you found the article or the DOI for the article. DOI means digital object identifier; it’s a unique set of characters that acts like a web address. It looks like this doi: 10.1016/j.tree.2012.05.011

What do I do if I can’t find the date or author?
This happens frequently enough that there are rules about how to deal with missing elements in a citation. You need to consult the guidebook to make sure you present the information correctly. Here are three options for consulting a rulebook.
• Publication Manual of the American Psychological Association at the library reference desk.
• Seneca Libraries Guide to Research & Citation: APA Style available for purchase for $5 at the Seneca bookstore.
